The English style in landscaping, also known as the landscape or natural style, originated during the Romantic period. Its aim is to inspire, bring pleasure and a sense of complete tranquillity. The English garden mimics its surroundings as much as possible, creating an atmosphere that invites relaxation and contemplation.

In England, people value their privacy, which is why they love having their own home with a garden. They enjoy designing their gardens, no matter how small, as much as they care for their homes. Gardens in England are special, even tiny ones that might not be used in other countries are turned into charming little garden spaces.

The style of English gardens is well-known and has a big impact on gardening. These gardens are popular among those who love gardening, design, and history because they look beautiful, have a long tradition and their own special characteristics.

The English garden is the result of the evolution of garden art over the centuries. It is characterised by its natural beauty, flowing lines and sophisticated composition. The main elements of an English garden include dense plant compositions, water features (ponds, fountains), terraces, arches, alleys and benches that create a cosy and relaxing atmosphere.

Current trends in English garden and landscape design include an increased emphasis on environmental sustainability, the use of native plants and materials, and the integration of modern technology such as automatic watering and lighting systems.

England is known as the place where the style of garden design we see all over Europe first started. This style really shows off how beautiful nature is. In these English gardens, you will find trees and bushes not lined up in rows, but put together in a way that looks good and natural. The paths in the garden go up and down with the land, and there are rivers and ponds that make everything feel alive and fresh. These gardens are so pretty and look so natural that it is hard to imagine how much work people had to do to make them look that way.

In English garden design, it is really important to use things that come from nature, like wood and stone. If there is a house in the garden, it should look like it belongs there. You might see plants growing up the sides of the house, and at the entrance, there might be wooden arches or iron decorations with roses on them. This makes the house blend in with the garden, and at night, the lights make the entrance look warm and welcoming.
